ASUM SUMMER BUDGET

Campus Recreation would like to develop an "Adventure Program" for the students at the University of Montana and the citizens of our state. We currently are able to find ~~qualified~~ grateful individuals to help us build the course and perfect the program into a year round activity.

Much of the rationale and justification for this outdoor "adventure approach" to Campus Recreation emerges out of a persons experience in trying it. There are, however, some important goals that are at the very heart of the course, tying all the varied activities together. These learning goals are:

1. To increase the participant's sense of personal confidence.

The aim of many activities is to allow the students to view themselves as increasingly capable and competent. By attempting a graduated series of activities which involve physical or emotional risk, and succeeding (or sometimes failing) in a supportive group atmosphere a student may begin to develop true self-esteem.

The course has also been planned to encourage students to try new and different activities - some of which may involve initial anxiety. It is our belief that as a person matures he needs to learn to be familiar with the anxiety that preceeds any new venture, cope with that uncertainty and dare to enter fully into new situations.

2. To increase mutual support within a group.

The course is based on the assumption that anyone who conscientiously tries, should be respected. Success and failure are less important than making an effort. In many cases, the success or failure of a group depends on the effort of the members. A cooperative, supportive atmosphere tends to encourage participation. The use of the teams, points and timed competition has consciously been minimized.

3. To develop an increased level of agility and physical coordination.

A number of exercises entail the use of balance and smoothly flowing movement. Balance and coordinated movement form the basis for many physical activities ranging from dancing to track and football.

A person who perceives himself as physically awkward often sees himself as inadequate in other ways. Balance activities which can be successfully completed often give a feeling of accomplishment and personal worth to the doer.

4. To develop an increased joy in one's physical self and in being with others.
One of the criteria which we have used in assessing various activities is that it must have an element of fun in it. Instructors are not solemnly engaged in building confidence, social cohesion, and agility. Just as people in the program may regularly be anxious and even fearful, so should they even more regularly experience joy, laughter, anticipation.

The program is designed to give the participants many opportunities to come to recognize that they are physical beings and that using one's body can be joyous, satisfying, exhilarating and unambiguous experience.

5. To develop an increased familiarity and identification with the natural world.
Young people have often had little experience with sun, rain, dirt, snow, cold, Spring, Fall and Winter. This unit is taught in the outdoors. Thus, students are out in weather which ranges from sunny and warm to cloudy and close to zero.

Because of the activities involved in the program, the students become increasingly comfortable with the smell of grass, with the feel of rain or snow or wind or cold or sunlight - in all their various moods. The weather always adds to the unpredictability of the course.

In many ways the course and the risks involved are uncompromising. For students the experience is both stressful and joyous. Ideally as they dare to try, they begin to experience physical success and recognize that the seemingly difficult is often quite possible. Their struggles are often the beginnings of maturity which we believe entails, in part, having real experience with a wide range of natural human reactions - fear, joy, fatigue, compassion, laughter, pain and love.
